Informal caregivers, new coping tools

By Sondra Shapiro

t was supposed to be a quiet evening at home with dear friends. I spent the Lafternoon cooking and setting the table. Two hours before the meal, my friend called to say she had received a call from her 85-year-old mother, who had just been admitted to the hospital. Complicating issues, her mom lives in a neighboring state. Needless to say, dinner plans were put on the back burner as my friend rushed to be by her mom's side.

Her mother was diagnosed with pneumonia, which led to other complications. Every day for a week, my friend traveled to the hospital for conferences with doctors and to check on her mom's wellbeing.

Just My Opinion

When her mom was well enough to go home, my friend was overwhelmed by the task of arranging for post-hospital care. She was also concerned about her mom getting the proper nutrition and didn't know how to handle the older woman's lethargy and depression.

Most informal caregivers have similar stories to tell. According to AARP, 42 million Americans, 1.3 million in Massachusetts, help care for aging parents, spouses and other loved ones. As a small business owner, my friend is also typical of the three out of five caregivers that are in the labor force.

The average family caregiver is a 49-year-old female who takes care of a 77-year-old woman — usually her mother. She provides 20 hours a week of assistance to her loved one, although she may be on call around-the-clock.

"When it comes to family dynamics, caregiving is the norm," said Mike Festa, state director of AARP Massachusetts, "If you're not a caregiver now, you were one in the past or you'll likely be one in the

The majority of older Americans prefer independent living. To ensure that lifestyle, informal caregivers provide the bulk of assistance, including help with bathing and dressing; meal preparation; managing finances; transportation and grocery shopping, according to AARP.

In Massachusetts, family caregivers provide unpaid care valued at a $10.6 billion annually. The cost of informal caregiving for U.S. elderly is $522 billion annually, according to a new RAND Corporation study. Americans spend an estimated 30 billion hours a year providing care to elderly relatives and friends. That cost is measured by valuing the time caregivers have given up in order to be able to provide care, according to RAND, a nonprofit research organization.

The study improves on earlier estimates about the value of informal caregiving by making use of the 2011 and 2012 American Time Use Survey database that provides up-to-date cost estimates. Beginning in 2011, the American Time Use Survey, conducted by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, began asking participants about time spent helping elderly relatives with daily activities. Respondents also reported on their employment status.

Researchers calculated hourly wages for working caregivers by dividing weekly wages by weekly hours worked, and for non-workers by estimating wages based on characteristics such as education, age and

Replacing that informal care with unskilled paid care at minimum wage would cost $221 billion, while replacing it with skilled nursing care would cost $642 billion annually.

Rand used these cited parameters to reach its conclusions. "Our findings provide a new and better estimate of the monetary value of the care that millions of relatives and friends provide to the nation's elderly," said Amalavoyal V. Chari, the study's lead author, a former researcher at RAND and a lecturer at the University of Sussex. "These numbers are huge and help put the enormity of this largely silent and unseen workforce into perspective.

The RAND study results make a case for the workplace flexibility policies that offer paid time for caregivers being considered by a number of states, said Dr. Ateev Mehrotra, co-author of the study. He is a researcher at RAND and an associate professor at the Harvard Medical School.

The monetary cost of care is only part of the equation. Feelings of guilt, helplessness, anger and pressure take a toll on those providing care and can ultimately result in physical or emotional sickness. "At a time when the need for social and emotional support is the greatest, caregivers often face feelings of isolation that jeopardize their health and well-being, according to information provided by Aging Institute, a Pennsylvania-based nonprofit that provides services for adults, families and caregivers. "Social interaction plays an important role in maintaining a caregiver's health by providing an opportunity for communication and an outlet for emotional expression.'

The recent launch of iheartcaregivers. com by AARP provides such an outlet by allowing caregivers to share their stories. Besides a cathartic exercise for the writer, a perusal of the site and its individual stories reveals candid and poignant stories that other caregivers could easily relate to and learn from.

Some snippets:

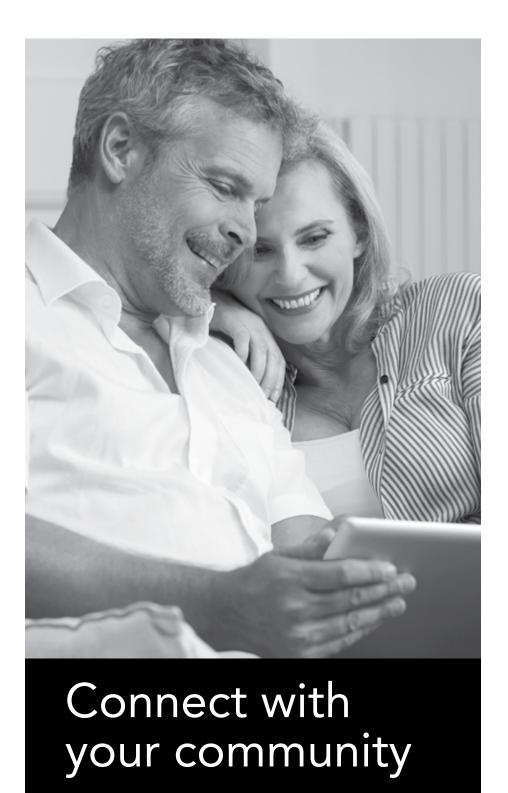

Nancy from Maryland — "I figured I could manage a couple days before the nurse started. But within an hour of arriving home, I discovered that the line to my mom's (very large) oxygen tank was 4 feet long - which precluded any kind of mobility. I began an endless series of calls to the pharmacy.

"Didn't the hospital tell you to get the deluxe and portable system?"

'Well, no, they didn't tell me ANYthing.

Amy from Arizona — I've been a caregiver my entire adult life. First I helped support my grandparents. Then I helped my mom, when she had a stroke at age 63, some 20 years ago, making frequent crosscountry trips from Washington, D.C., to Arizona. Mom broke her hip while visiting me in 2004 and I nursed her through that. When Dad showed signs of Alzheimer's disease, I began managing their finances from a distance and my sister who lived

Autobiographical writing provides therapy, history preservation

By Brian Goslow

WORCESTER —

ucia Knoles, an English professor at Assumption College, was facing an adult child's worst nightmare beloved parent's voice telling them their life had lost its spark.

"My father was this really bright guy who spent his whole life running a trucking company," Knoles said, "and he started calling me every morning at 8 o'clock and he'd say, 'It's Dad. I have no purpose. I have no meaning."

Both of Knoles' parents, who had lived in the greater Pittsburgh area, had been in Falter the midst of steep health decline when she moved them to Eisenberg Assisted Living Residence.

One morning, while awaiting her father's call. Knoles put together a list of 10 things they could do together. "I said, 'Pick one and we could do a project," she said.

One of those suggestions was to start an autobiography and life writing group at Eisenberg, whose programs she was familiar with due to having been a long-time care ombudsman at the facility.

"He had started writing a bit of his life story earlier in his retirement and really enjoyed it," Knoles said. So we put up posters, sent out announcements, and said we're going to have this class.'

The end result surprised her and taught her — and those involved with the program - an important life lesson.

"I expected people to tell kind of funny or interesting stories about the old Model-T; I found something entirely different," Knoles said. "I found out that people who live in places like assisted living residences live in an environment of enforced intimacy without necessarily knowing each other very well. By writing and sharing their life stories, they got to know one and other on a whole different level and became close to each other. They began to develop a community.

"As people get older they're dealing with a number of losses or new problems, illnesses, new ways of living ... by writing about those things, people could express it.

The participants self-published a book of their writings, and read their work at a public reading attended by their friends, family and members of the Eisenberg staff. The exercise allowed those in attendance to begin seeing the residents as people with a life's worth of experiences rather than identifying them with the health difficulties they were now facing. "By having stories that they could pass on to their loved ones, they felt that they had something to give — they felt that they had a purpose," Knoles said.

Some of the comments from group members afterward captured the program's accomplishment: "There was a woman who was 100 who said, 'I used to think I was a cast-off; now I know I'm a writer,' " Knoles said. "Another person said, 'They thought we were just a bunch of old people. Now they know we're smart.'

"It was a sense that they could keep learning and keep accomplishing that was really important to them — It was an area where they could show growth instead of decline," said Knoles, who is now creating a model program for writers' groups that could be used at facilities and organizations that work with seniors.

It would be hard to have tougher two years than Suzanne Falter endured. The California resident went through a divorce, loss of her home, mother and career.

What hit the hardest was the loss of her best friend, her 22-year-old daughter, Teal, to a mysterious cardiac arrest.

While she had been in Teal's hospital room, she knew the collective experiences of the past two years would serve as a 'transformational experience" to guide her into a new way of helping people.

The day after Teal died, Falter started writing. "I just knew I had to write my feelings about what was happening in order to say what I needed to say," she said. "Putting it down on the page is so therapeutic, it was so cathartic and it helped me understand what was happening to me.'

As the number of essays she wrote grew to 50, she decided to share them on Facebook. As people discovered them, they commented with heartfelt responses. "Like many writers, I think I'm alone all the time and nobody's even reading my work when in fact, people are," Falter said. "So, when people start to say 'this moves me' and so and so happened to them, I really relate. I saw the depth of sharing that's happening around the writing and realized there's a larger purpose — you're not alone.'

Not only did people respond to Falter's writings, they shared them with others. Her first Facebook entry — on why women cry — went viral, Williams eventually being read by 130,000 people. "I posted it because I woke up in the middle of the night crying thinking about crying and why women cry."

The response convinced Falter to utilize her collection of entries as the foundation of a book on her experiences. She said that Surrendering to Joy: A Year of Love, Letting Go and Forgiveness (Love & Happiness Publishing) was surprisingly easy to write. While she found the deepest entries were "emotionally intense," especially the one on cleaning out her daughter's closet after her death, she also found the process invaluable. "It was a very difficult experience but somehow, writing about it was a delight because I knew the powerful experience that I had had and I knew I really had something to say about this.

Her advice to others in confronting hard times through the written word? "My experience with unfinished business is that it will stay unfinished till you confront it," Falter said. My stuck space in my writing is usually about an emotional place that was not resolvable at that moment. I needed to put it aside for a few days and then go back and reopen it and take it from there. Eventually, when you're ready, you can begin to release what's there — but not till it's ready. You have your internal guiding systems that's really showing each step of the way and you have to trust it."

And the most important thing to remem-

In her book, Falter writes, "We get fascinated by our own story. And it stops us. Our story is certainly noteworthy, and full of intriguing turns and twists. But it is only what happened once to us. Today is, indeed, a different day.'

Linda Jones McCarthy, 61, of Worcester, had been creating rhymes since she was four, and writing since the age of 10; she's written 300 songs, McCarthy released two CDs, a children's book and most recently, The Heart Remembers, a collection of poetry and prose.

The ability to write has never failed her. "The closest I've come to writer's block was having to switch to writing lyrics and music and if I get stuck there, back to prose," McCarthy said. "It's always the written word.

"I started writing poetry as a four-yearold at my grandparents. I'd hop around in the backseat and my grand mom would play a rhyming game with me. She'd teach me the cadence.

> So I grew up with rhyme in my brain."

> You've most likely read her work — In the early 1980s, she was a freelancer for American Greeting Cards, working for its Those Characters from Cleveland division where she wrote rhymed couplets for its Care Bears, Strawberry Shortcake and Ziggy products.

McCarthy invested $7,000 of her own money to print her first children's book, Spider in the Shower, for which she used the name, Lillie Jones. "I started writing for children 10 or 12 years ago," McCarthy said. "I've read it in elementary schools and libraries in Massachusetts and Connecticut."

While her writing has put smiles on the faces of children, families and coffeehouse concertgoers, it's also helped McCarthy through the tough times in her life.

Well, yes. I've been divorced twice," she said. "First, there were all of the love poems when we were falling in love. And then there were all of the missing you poems when they took jobs away from home. Then there were the wonderful break up poems and heartache poems and tomorrow is another day ... those kind of poems."

Despite the challenges life has sometimes thrown her, McCarthy said she's never written out of bitterness or anger; instead a lot of her compositions come from melancholy and sadness. "When I look back, some songwriter once said, it broke my heart but it made a pretty song," said McCarthy, who's proud of the fact that she remains friends with both her ex-husbands. "Paying bills and working overtime, life got in the way."

David Williams, 61, of Worcester, was in his office six years ago at Wheaton College, where he was an English professor, when he suddenly passed out. "My boss found me, I managed to get home and that was the end of all the teaching and everything I was doing," he said.

Williams had suffered a stroke and has no recollection of the six months that followed. Gradually, some of his memory returned. "The way things settled out, I have access to my long-term memory but my short-term memory is not good," he said.

"I can remember things that happened 40 years ago but I don't know what happened yesterday.'

A year after his stroke, someone suggested Williams try writing an autobiography that he could give to his daughter, who was interested in her family history. "I told her plenty of stories over the years but I never would have thought of writing an autobiography," he said. "Once I got into it, it worked out OK. Sometimes it's an effort, but it's coming along.'

Before his stroke, Williams was known for his storytelling skills and his ability to impart that knowledge to his students. "People were always impressed at my memory for detail so it's kind of ironic that I should have memory problems as a result of the stroke," he said.

When he can't remember something or he's not sure about certain details, he'll ask friends to help him confirm or remind him. When they do, he's able to clearly confirm what they're telling him. "Then I can say, 'oh yes, I know that is true,'" Williams said.

He's currently exploring his first years of adulthood in his autobiographical writing. "I can look back and appreciate what was going on and see the value in it," Williams said. "Even though a lot of things were difficult, here were so many fortunate things in terms of friendship, in terms of emotional support. I was learning about life and about how the world works — and I guess that's what happens a lot in your 20s.

Williams recently returned to doing what he loves best — teaching as a volunteer tutor in basic literacy at a local adult learning center twice a week.

Program provides social outlet for grandparents and grandchildren

By Brian Goslow

n the last Tuesday of each month, at 10 a.m., the average age of visitors to the Worcester Senior Center usually goes down — way down — thanks to a program in which area grandparents bring their grandchildren for a morning of activities that include reading, singing, costume parties and holiday celebrations.

The monthly Grandparent/Child Program, which has been in place for several years, was created with a "Celebrate Families" theme. "It's not uncommon these days to have grandparents, who have retired, serving as caregivers for their grandchildren during the day while their parents work," said Beth Vietze, coordinator for Worcester Family Partnership (WFP), a Massachusetts Department of Education and Care grant program. "Many of them bring their grandkids and it gives them something to do."

It can be difficult for grandparents to find activities to take their grandchildren to and also help the children learn to socialize with others. "Even if they don't provide full-time caregiving, they want something they can do together," Vietze said. "It's an opportunity for interaction."

Most of the adults are "younger grandparents" in the 50 to 60 age range. who care for their grandchildren a couple of days a week while their parents work.

There was a good turnout in October when WFP put on a "Pumpkinfest" that the children attended in costume; senior center staff set up "trick or treat" pickup stations throughout the building. "If you're a parent with a young child, it's kind of fun to dress up the kiddies and have their grandparent take them out," said Vietze, noting the event also provided the grandparents with a daytime opportunity to satisfy the youngsters' desire to celebrate Halloween and not have them go out trick or treating at night. "It's something that's safe."

The seniors, who normally attend activities at the senior center, also enjoy seeing the young children. "It brings some life into the building," said Vietze, who said the center's staff has done a good job at being welcoming to families in the community with young children

Retired colonel named outstanding woman veteran

By George W. Rhodes

ATTLEBORO —

Julie Hall helped pave the way for women in the military, and now she's been named the state's outstanding female veteran.

Hall, 56, and one of 11 candidates for the Deborah Sampson Award this year, is a retired Air Force colonel with 30 years of active duty on her resume and who advocates for veterans as a retiree. Hall is the 14th woman since 2005 to receive the award, given by the Women's Veterans Network to a female veteran who has been a pioneer for women in the military, then continues her efforts after retirement.

It was named after a female Revolutionary War veteran.

Northampton author's novel tells of '80s Nicaragua

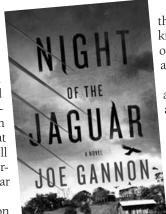

By Steve Pfarrer

NORTHAMPTON —

Then Islamic State militants beheaded two American journalists in the last several weeks, Joe Gannon was saddened and horrified. But in another sense, he wasn't that surprised, knowing full well the dangers that foreign correspondents can face in a war zone.

Gannon, of Northampton, had worked as a reporter in Nicaragua and El Salvador in the 1980s, covering civil war and human rights abuses that made international headlines. He'd had his own brush with danger: He was once arrested by the Salvadoran military, held as a suspected terrorist with his hands tied behind his back and interrogated at bayonet point.

"It was at about that point that I started thinking, 'I don't know if I'm going to come out of this (alive),' " he said during a recent interview in his home.

Gannon, 54, was eventually released without harm, and he's long since left his reporting days behind; today he's a middle school English teacher, and he's worked in the film industry and taught English overseas. But he's also recalled some of his experiences and the volatile era he covered in his debut novel, Night of the Jaguar, a thriller set in the aftermath of Nicaragua's bloody civil war and the Sandinista government's continued fight against the U.S.-backed "Contra" forces.

Night of the Jaguar published by Minotaur Books, a division of St. Martin's Press/Macmillan Publishers, has won early praise from critics for its tense atmospherics, dark humor, and sobering portrait of a country seared by war. Publisher's Weekly calls it "riveting (and) action-packed," while Kirkus Reviews writes, "Considering its level of mayhem, it's remarkable that so few mystery writers have drawn on Nicaragua as a fictional setting. So Gannon's dark, dense, tangled debut is doubly welcome."

Gannon, a 1984 graduate of the University of Massachusetts Amherst, says he conceived of the novel, in a very broad sense, when he was working as a freelance reporter in Nicaragua and El Salvador in the late 1980s, writing stories for The Christian Science Monitor, the Toronto Globe & Mail and other publications.

But it wasn't until more recent years, including the time he spent earning an MFA at Pine Manor College in Brookline, that the complete story began to emerge. He said his goal was to write a good story that drew on some of his experiences but would stand on its own as a work of fiction, while also offering a realistic portrait of Nicaragua and how it was shaped by poverty, civil war and its use as a proxy battlefield between the United States and the former Soviet Union.

"I wanted to show how people are changed by war," said Gannon, who teaches English at Duggan Middle School in Springfield. "Ajax (the book's main character) has fought in the civil war, he's served with the revolutionary government, and he's not the same person — he's damaged, and he's trying to come to terms with that ... it's not easy."

Night of the Jaguar is set during the summer of 1986, seven years after Nicaraguan Sandinista revolutionaries have overthrown longtime dictator Anastasio Somoza (known in the book as "the Ogre") and established a communist government. Since the early 1980s, that same government, the FSLN, has been battling right-wing counter-revolution-a medical chief operating officer gave Julie the opportunity to show that women could lead, could run big medical facilities and could command," he said in a fourpage nomination letter.

Among Hall's early assignments was a tour of duty in Korea, where she served as Medical Service Corps officer and implemented a number of improvements in medical services at Osan Air Force Base.

One of those was having medical documents translated into Korean to better assist the Korean wives of U.S. military personnel, hiring translators and even learning Korean.

Hall later worked for the secretary of defense for health affairs, and then became administrator for the Air Force Medical Wing in Washington, D.C.

Viviana Marcotte of the Women's Veterans Network said great weight in the selection process is given to the veteran's activities after retirement.

Here, Hall also excels, advocating for women in a number of the city's veterans organizations. She has or does hold leadership positions in Disabled American Veterans Chapter 91, Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 115 and American Legion Post 20 in Attleboro, Bradshaw said.

Hall is among those who visit veterans in nursing homes on their birthdays and is a member of the Veterans Panel at Attleboro High School.

She participates in all veterans events and has become an important volunteer in the veterans office, Bradshaw said.

"She's become my right-hand woman," he said.

Hall, who's a member of the city's planning board, said she's thrilled to get the award.

"It's a great honor and I'm humbled by it," she said.

Sampson, who was originally from Plympton and later moved to Middleboro, enlisted in the Continental Army in 1782, disguised as a man.

She was wounded in battle in New York and was only discovered to be a woman after becoming ill from a fever.

However, it was clear she performed her duties as well as her male counterparts and received an honorable discharge. — AP/The Sun Chronicle

Feeling Healthy

OK, so we have germs: But they're our unique germs

By Lauran Neergaard

WASHINGTON —

Sorry, clean freaks. No matter how well you scrub your home, it's covered in bacteria from your own body. And if you pack up and move, new research shows, you'll rapidly transfer your unique microbial fingerprint to the doorknobs, countertops and floors in your new house, too.

In fact, researchers who studied seven families in Illinois, Washington and California could easily match up who lived where using their microscopic roommates, almost like CSI for germs.

The study is part of an effort to understand how the trillions of mostly beneficial bacteria that live in and on our bodies—what's called the human microbiome — interact with bugs in the environment to affect our health.

"We have so little information about where the microbes come from that shape our microbiome, whether it's for health or disease," said microbiologist Jack Gilbert of the Argonne National Laboratory and University of Chicago.

Where do people spend most of their time? "It's the indoor environment. The best place to look at that was the home," said Gilbert, who led the Home Microbiome Project and included his own family.

Right at birth, babies start picking up microbes on the skin, in the nose, in the gut that eventually make up living communities that will share their bodies throughout life. Many of these bugs play critical roles in digestion, the immune system and other health-inducing factors. Others may make it easier to gain weight, or influence disease. What shapes the balance of good bugs and bad is a huge scientific question.

Hospital studies make clear that someone who already is sick can catch a new infection from pathogenic bacteria left behind by a previous patient.

In contrast, the new study examines healthy people, and it marks an important step: Beginning to show what's normal in a regular home, said Dr. Lisa Helbling Chadwick of the National Institutes of Health (NIH). That's a key question before scientists can explore how to possibly create healthier homes.

"You have to think about the microbiome of your home as part of your home's immune system," said Chadwick, of NIH's National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, who wasn't involved with Gilbert's project. "Instead of relying on killing bugs to stop the spread of infection, maybe we need to cultivate better bugs."

For the study, Gilbert recruited seven households that included 15 adults, three children, three dogs and a cat. For six weeks, participants collected samples of the microscopic bugs living on and around them by swabbing the hands, feet, noses and paws of everyone in the household, plus doorknobs, light switches, floors and countertops.

Back in the laboratory, Gilbert's team identified the bugs by their DNA, and they reported in the journal Science that people substantially affect the microbial communities n their homes.

Different homes harbored markedly different bacterial populations, but they closely matched the microbiomes of their residents.

The big surprise: How quickly the bugs settled in. Like Pigpen's trailing cloud of dust in the Peanuts comic strip, when three families moved — one of them from a hotel room to a house — it took about a day for the microbes in their new homes to closely resemble those in the old ones.

"The speed at which that colonization happens was quite remarkable," Gilbert said. Sure, there are some leftover bacteria

Some cancer treatments can be skipped

By Marilynn Marchione

SAN ANTONIO —

Tens of thousands of women each year might be able to skip at least some of the grueling treatments for breast cancer — which can include surgery, heavy chemo and radiation — without greatly harming their odds of survival, new research suggests.

The research is aimed at curbing overtreatment, a big problem in cancer care. Treatments help many women beat the disease, but giving too many or ones that aren't really needed causes unnecessary expense, trauma and lifelong side effects, such as arm swelling and heart troubles. Radiation can even raise the risk of new cancers.

Several new studies identify groups of patients who might be able to safely forgo certain treatments.

One found that many older women can skip radiation after surgery for early-stage tumors. Two others suggest that surgery may not help patients whose cancer has already spread widely. A fourth study tested a "light chemo" combination that could become a new standard of care

Treatments

The trend is "less and less therapy" for certain cancer types, said Dr. C. Kent Osborne of Baylor College of Medicine.

The highlights:

•Surgery — Breast cancer is already widely spread in 5 to 20 percent of newly diagnosed patients, and at that point is usually incurable. The main treatment is chemotherapy or hormone treatments that attack cancer throughout the body. Sometimes doctors also remove the breast tumor in hope of prolonging survival, but this has not been put to a hard test.

Dr. Rajendra Badwe, director of the Tata

Memorial Hospital in Mumbai, India, led a study of 350 women with widely spread cancers that had shrunk after initial chemotherapy. Half were given surgery to remove the breast or the lump plus any cancerous lymph nodes. The rest did not have surgery.

After about two years, 40 percent of both groups were alive, suggesting that medicines are enough and that these women can be spared the ordeal of having all or part of a breast removed.

A second study by Dr. Atilla Soran of the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center of nearly 300 women in Turkey also suggests surgery is not helping, though there were hints that some groups did better or worse. Surgery seemed to help if cancer had spread just to bone, and it appeared to do harm if it had spread to the liver or lungs.

"These are incredibly important, big-deal studies," said Dr. Claudine Isaacs, a breast specialist at Georgetown University's Lombardi Comprehensive Cancer Center. Many doctors jumped on earlier, less rigorous studies and advised women to have surgery, and this should be a warning against that, she said.

The results also may spur interest in a U.S. study on the topic. Dr. Seema Khan of Northwestern University in Chicago has had so much trouble recruiting participants that she lowered her goal and may not be able to answer the ques-

"There's a huge amount of bias" among doctors and patients about what is best, she said.

•Radiation — Most breast cancers are found at an early stage, and many women are treated with surgery followed by hormones or chemotherapy, plus radiation. But cancer medicines have gotten so good at lowering the risk of a recurrence that doctors wonder whether the radiation is still needed. It can cause heart and other problems, especially in older women, and three or four weeks of daily treatments can be a burden.

Dr. Ian Kunkler of the University of Edinburgh in Scotland led a study of 1,326 patients 65 or older with earlystage cancers whose growth was driven by hormones. This is the most common form of the disease and the age group that accounts for most cases. Half were given radiation and half skipped it.

After five years, roughly 96 percent of both groups were alive, and most deaths were not from breast cancer. About 1 percent of those given radiation had cancer recur in the treated breast versus 4 percent of those who skipped radiation.

For every 100 women given radiation, "one will have a recurrence anyway, four will have a recurrence prevented, but 95 will have had unnecessary treatment," Kunkler said. Since radiation did not affect survival or the risk of cancer spreading, skipping it "is a reasonable option.

•"Light" Chemo — Doctors are unsure how to treat women with small tumors involving the gene that the drug Herceptin targets. Those tumors are low risk because they're still confined to the breast, but high risk because the gene is thought to make them more aggressive. Some women get heavy-duty chemo, including drugs that can damage the heart.

Dr. Eric Winer of the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute in Boston led a study of 406 women given "light chemo" paclitaxel plus Herceptin for 12 weeks, followed by nine months of Herceptin alone. More than three years later, only four had cancer recur in the same breast, and two had recurrences in other places. "This is likely to become a new standard," Winer said. — AP from previous occupants, he said. But many bacteria die or go dormant after a while on a hard, air-conditioned surface. At the same time, the oil in your skin readily transfers your own bacteria to surfaces. That's not counting all those tiny flakes of dead skin that people constantly shed, microbe-filled dust that probably just blankets the bugs that were there first, Gilbert noted.

"It changed my perspective almost on hotel rooms," he added with a laugh.

In another home, someone went on a three-day trip, and that person's contribution to the usual household microbe mix dropped noticeably.

And dogs moved the bacteria from surface to surface even more rapidly.

As for potentially dangerous bacteria, in one house, the scientists tracked a germ called Enterobacter from one person's hands to the kitchen counter and then to another person's hands. No one got sick, possibly because the residents were healthy and hadn't recently used antibiotics, Gilbert said.

It will take more research to figure out where the different bugs that people and their pets bring into their homes originally come from. And Gilbert pointed to the study's other implication: Maybe people should make sure they're regularly getting outside to expose themselves, and their immune systems, to a wider variety of bugs. — AP

Aruba is the perfect winter getaway

By Victor Block

n explosion of scarlet, purple and other vivid colors of lush tropical foliage sets off a gleaming white sand beach that rims the azure sea. Nearby, stretches of rocks and pebbly soil interspersed with cactus comprise a very different bleak, desert-like terrain. The variety of landscapes on Aruba is echoed by the diversity of its attractions.

Aruba's white sand beaches are among the most beautiful in the Caribbean. Touches of European charm abound around the island.

While Spain and Great Britain held sway over Aruba, the Dutch took it over in 1636 and it has remained under their control since, except for a short period in the early 19th century. Reminders of the island's Dutch heritage are everywhere. Today, it is an autonomous member of the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

One distinctive landmark is an authentic windmill built in 1804 that once drained water from low-lying areas of Holland. In 1960, the structure was taken apart, shipped to Aruba and reassembled in its unlikely Caribbean setting, where it has housed several restaurants and night clubs.

Most people visit Aruba for its palm tree-lined beaches overlooking crystal clear water. A seven-mile line of beaches backs up to the high-rise hotels that rim the sheltered southwestern and western coastline. The windswept northern and eastern coasts, which are battered by the sea, have been left largely undeveloped. Each stretch of shoreline, along with the arid island interior, has its own appeal.

Rugged limestone cliffs run along much of the northeastern coastline. They mark one boundary of Arikok National Park, an ecological preserve that sprawls over nearly 20 percent of the island.

Hiking trails crisscross the park, and its more isolated areas offer opportunities to spot native parakeets, burrowing owls and other wildlife.

Intriguing chapters of Aruba's history come alive in this setting. Shallow cave formations recall a time when a small branch of Arawak Indians inhabited the island. Brownish-red drawings that ornament walls and ceilings attest to their presence.

Reminders of Aruba's agricultural past in the park include a long-deserted adobe farm house, while abandoned mines recall a mini-gold rush that got underway in 1825 and lasted for nearly a century.

Speaking of gold, the presence of 12 casinos has earned the island the nickname of "Las Vegas of the Caribbean." While most casinos are located in major resort hotels, there are two in Oranjestad, Aruba's capital and largest city.

Oranjestad has other attractions. The Dutch colonial architecture of many buildings, some dating back to the late 18th century, comes in a variety of pastel colors.

The busy port teems with the coming and going of boats and sidewalks with crowds of sightseers and shoppers.

Architecture

When not spending money on shopping or gambling, visitors have a choice of several small but interesting museums. The Archaeological Museum is housed in a cluster of colorfully painted homes that were occupied by a local family for nearly 130 years beginning in 1870. The exhibits inside showcase the history of Indians on Aruba. They range from an ancient long house and native hut to artifacts dating back as far as 2500 BC.

The Historical Museum of Aruba is housed in Fort Zoutman. That fortification was built in 1796-1798 to protect the island from pirates, and the town soon began to grow around it.

The museum has displays about farming, fishing and other aspects of island life, including interesting tidbits about villages. For example, the town of Noord began as an Indian community, while the hamlet of Rancho was established as a fishing village around 1855.

Stops at other small villages also provide introductions to what locals call "the real Aruba." San Nicolas is the second largest town, after Oranjestad, yet a world away in atmosphere. While it once jumped to the beat of workers at the now-abandoned nearby oil refinery, it's usually on the quiet side these days.

Several shops and restaurants line a mini-promenade along the main street, but the biggest draw in town is Charlie's Bar. Beginning in the early 1940s, scuba divers who dropped by attached their underwater finds to the walls and ceiling, creating what today is a bric-a-brac heaven.

The main claim to fame of Paradera village is its location close to two intriguing natural sites that were sacred places to Indians. The Ayo and Casibari rock formations consist of huge boulder formations that rise up from the sandy desert terrain. Over time, prevailing winds have carved the rocks into unusual shapes that, with a little imagination, resemble birds and dragons.

Steps have been carved into the rock at the Casibari site and those who climb to the top are rewarded with a panoramic view of the island. Some of the stones at Ayo still bear petroglyphs scratched and painted onto the surface by Indian artists.

Those boulders rising from a flat, stark landscape provide a setting very different from the white sand beaches of Aruba. Both are among the something-for-everyone variety that makes the island an inviting winter getaway destination.

Hybrid tricycle designed to increase mobility

By Melissa Griffiths

IUNEAU, Alaska -

dventure runs in the Janes family, so when Bob Janes found his father's age affected his ability to be active outdoors, something had to be done.

So Janes invented the Access Hybrid, a trike with an assistive electric motor, meant to provide all the fun of a bicycle and all the function of a traditional mobility device.

"My father, three years ago, at 89, was given a standard mobility scooter," Janes said. "He didn't feel like himself on it. He'd been active all his life."

Not a stranger to designing new technology to meet his needs, Janes worked out a design for the Access Hybrid to give his father a way to be active despite his declining physical health, the Juneau Empire reported. Janes said his father could barely walk 10 feet at that point, but when he tried out the Access Hybrid he could go for a couple miles.

The Access Hybrid looks like a cross between a mobility scooter and a tricycle. It has a cushioned, stable seat; handle bars with a traditional gear shift and hand brake, but also a throttle lever for using the electric motor; slanted rear wheels for stability and an elongated head tube with a tight turning radius while the electric motor is in use and smaller front wheel; plus foot rests for when the pedals are not in use.

The rider sits in a comfortable, upright

The eight-speed allows for some breeze-through-your-hair at higher speeds, and pedaling can recharge the electric motor for when the device is needed as a more traditional mobility scooter. It also plugs in for normal charging. Janes said the Access Hybrid gets 20 miles out of the motor before it needs to be recharged.

While Janes came up with the idea for the Access Hybrid, it's been a team effort. Working with him is engineer Mike Bly and welder Carlton Shorey. Janes' son, Robie Janes, has been Bob Janes riding the Access Hybrid involved in testing the Access Hybrid and marketing.

The first prototype was quite a hit, but they discovered a flaw on a trip to California, with Janes' father taking it for a spin at Knott's Berry Farm. They ran into trouble when the chain wrapped around the axel, causing it to flip over. There haven't been problems like that with newer versions.

The prototype Juneauites may have seen out on the docks this summer have been adjusted and improved after further testing and feedback from Bly and Shorey. Dock reps with Gastineau Guiding, the guiding company Janes owns with his wife, Dawn Wolfe, have been riding the Access Hybrid trikes from the office to the docks downtown.

Janes really put the Access Hybrid to the test on a November trip to California, spending the entire two weeks living as though he experienced a disability. From the airport in Juneau to the return trip home and everything in between, he used the Access Hybrid. He even went shopping at Target.

To Janes, it's important that people of all ages and abilities be able to be mobile and healthy. He said he's been working with different physical therapists and they agree that movement is crucial to health.

"Some people can't walk," Janes said. "But there's no reason they have to sit. ... People can use them to get out and enjoy the outdoors and fresh air, and still be stable, and able to get the exercise they need, get the movement their bodies need.

His father, while living at the Pioneer Home, enjoyed taking the Access Hybrid for a spin around Twin Lakes, he said.

around town, in use by the Janes family or Gastineau Guiding dock reps, the real unveiling was at a the Southeast Alaska Independent Living's (SAIL) annual picnic at Sandy Beach, where staff and clients of the organization got to test out the tiny fleet of trikes.

People of all ages and abilities hopped on the trikes and pedaled or motored around the parking lot.

Robie Janes, who has spent a lot of time on the Access Hybrid, careened around cars leaning on two wheels. Bob Janes showed off a tight 360-degree turn using the motor for power. He switched to pedal power, switched gears and tore off full-speed ahead.

SAIL clients grinned ear to ear while zipping around on the trikes. They looked right at home on a tricycle built for two and a handpedal tricycle — two other models available at the picnic. One enthusiastic young man had to be convinced by his grandmother to put on warmer pants; he was enjoying himself so much he kept riding while shivering.

"Everyone loves it," Robie said. "Everyone's having fun out here.

While the Access Hybrid was originally designed for Bob Janes' elderly father, Janes saw that it could be a good fit for people of all ages and abilities.

Centenarian: Voting a civic duty not to be avoided argaret Silver's ancestors fought in the Revolutionary War. She hasn't forgotten that sacrifice.

At 105 years old, the Heritage Village woman still visits the firehouse every Election Day to fill in the ovals on her ballot.

"It might stir some people up to vote if they see this 105-yearold woman out there voting," said her daughter, Elizabeth. "It's civic duty. It's as simple as that. It's a privilege that we have in this country that many other countries don't have, and we fought hard for that."

Silver, who was born in Minneapolis in 1909 when William Howard Taft was president, caused something of a stir shortly before 4 on Election Day afternoon when she stopped by the firehouse to vote.

Election workers greeted her warmly, then led her to a chair behind a partition where she could cast her ballot with the

Bay State's 50+ population a source of significant buying power

By Mike Festa

Just how much economic activity in Massachusetts is generated by people over age 50? Business owners and others might be surprised:

Across the nation, the aging population has proven to be an important and vital source of economic growth, according to "The Longevity Economy: Generating Economic Growth and New Opportunities for Business," a study conducted in 2013 by Oxford Economics and commissioned by AARP.

This study counters long-held beliefs about the negative financial impacts of aging on the U.S. economy by showing that the 50+ population has money to burn.

The Longevity Economy is the sum of all economic activity in the state by consumer spending among households headed by those over age 50. This growing and powerful population — comprised of boomers and the first of the millennials to turn 50 — is active, creative and working longer, which will fuel economic growth for years to come.

Seventy percent of those in the 50 to 64 age group are employed, compared to 79 percent of people age 25 to 49. People over 50 represent 34 percent of the Commonwealth's workforce. Among those 50 to 64 who are employed, 13 percent are self-employed entrepreneurs, compared with 7 percent of the 25 to 49 age group.

The analysis shows that the over 50 population is an important driver of economic growth in key sectors of the economy because the longer lifespan of the over 50 population essentially extend the period in which workers are at their most productive and creative. That means the Longevity Economy will continue to grow over time and all ages will see continued benefit through jobs, salaries and wages.

AARP and You

In Massachusetts, people over 50 also contribute to the economy in a positive way that is disproportionate considering their share of the population. Despite representing just 35 percent of the population, the total economic contribution of the Longevity Economy accounted for 49 percent of Massachusetts' gross domestic product (GDP) of $219 billion. The Longevity Economy's buying power accounted for the largest share of consumer spending on health care (67 percent), other nondurables such as pharmaceuticals and household supplies (60 percent) and financial services (58 percent).

In 2013, the Longevity Economy supported 55 percent, or 2.4 million of Massachusetts jobs; 49 percent of employee compensation, valued at $125 billion; and 49 percent of state taxes, to the tune of $20 billion. The Longevity Economy contributed largely to job growth, having the greatest impact on jobs in health care (571,000), retail trade (342,000), and accommodation and food services industries (205,000).

According to the national Longevity Economy Report, this growing over 50 population is a powerful and transformative force, one that is changing the face of America and will for years to come.

According to Oxford Economics calculations, the 106 million people currently responsible for over $7 trillion in annual economic activity will reach $13.5 trillion by 2032.

The Longevity Economy reflects positive implications on the national economy and is a major source of financial and economic opportunity for generations to come.

New governor must listen to the needs of invisible elders

By Al Norman

assachusetts has elected a new governor.

One of the most striking details about the long campaign was the almost total lack of attention paid to the needs of the elderly. Seniors were invisible. No candidate really spoke to their issues.

issues.

Push Back

This is strange, given the fact that as of the last presidential election of 2012, there were 975,000 people age 65 and over in Massachusetts — 833,000 of them were registered voters. That's 22 percent of the registered voters, or more than one in five voters in this state. Roughly nine out of 10 actually voted in 2012. Elders turn out in the highest percentage of any state voters.

Where did these seniors go? Why did no one talk about them on the campaign trail?

If you look on the websites of the major candidates who ran for governor, you will find almost no mention of "seniors" or "elders" in their issues statements. You will find a lot about economic growth, jobs, schools, safer communities, energy policy, women, etc. But even on the issue of health care, there was no real focus on a "senior agenda."

One candidate promised to "increase investment into ... Medicare and Medicaid demonstrations to improve care for the most vulnerable and highest-cost patients." On the issue of housing, another candidate said: "housing shortages place impossible burdens on low-income working families and seniors."

One gubernatorial hopeful visited a senior center and spoke about public education, student loan forgiveness programs and expanding mental health services.

Gov. Deval Patrick managed to give seven State of the State messages in a row without specifying a single elderly agenda item of public priority.

I asked former Gov. Mike Dukakis about the low-recognition of elders as a public policy concern, and he told me: "It could be because people are complacent — they think elders are doing pretty well."

Yet if you ask a senior, they will tell you:

- •I can't live on a another 1.76 percent Social Security cost of living increase;
- •My winter fuel costs force me to 'heat or eat';
- •I haven't been able to afford to see a dentist in years;
- •I don't have the money to get my hearing aid fixed;
- •Even with food stamps, a trip to the grocery store is scary;
- •My rent is now 60 percent of my income

According to a recent report, 64 percent of elderly women and 53 percent of elderly men in Massachusetts are "economically insecure," which is defined as not having enough money to live on without going into debt, or relying on public assistance.

The incoming governor will find that elders have plenty of issues weighing on their mind.

Now that the politicking is over, we must get back to the fundamental challenge of making elders visible once again.

Dukakis may be right: elder well being may have been taken for granted. It may also be true that the media cannot see elderly people. It may be that elected officials are overwhelmed by the challenges of a decent education, or reducing drug use in our state. But certainly issues like the rising tide of elder abuse and financial exploitation are worth public discussion.

Elder advocates will have to keep on telling their stories as if they had never been told before, in hopes that elected officials will hear them like they've never heard them before.

Al Norman is the executive director of Mass Home Care, a network of 30 agencies whose mission is to keep elders living independently at home.

Top 10 ways for young and old to practice ageism

By Marianne Delorey©

ur entire society — everything from schools to nursing homes, is structured around age. It is hard to argue that ageism isn't the last "ism" we will need to overcome. So, to honor a society that values these stereotypes, here is a list of the top 10 ways to promote oversimplifying about someone's age.

10. Use words that define people based on negative generalizations. For the old, I recommend fogy, geezer and old maid. For the young, try whippersnapper, delinquent or green around the ears.

9. Discredit the experiences of the group you are looking to isolate. Make sure the young know that you had it so much worse. If you are young, tell your grandparent they are old school and they need to get with the times.

8. Involve technology. Point out that kids can't go anywhere without their cell phones. Also point out that older people still use a rotary dial landline phone.

7. Make a point to discredit their education to paint them as incompetent.

Caregiving Tips

If he is old, tell him that his degree is worthless now because everything has changed. If she is young, make a point to note that it is all book knowledge and she can't apply any of it

6. Put down their physical attributes. If you are talking to an old person, make sure you hold their arm and treat them like they need help. Point out all the health problems they have. If you are talking to a young person, say things like, "Oh, isn't she cute. She thinks working out will keep her perfect body forever.

5. Make sure you tie their mental limitations to the number of years they've been on this planet. Prompt your grandmother for an answer if she takes her time to respond to your question. Or call your grandson "hung over" or "hormonal" if he is having a bad day.

4. Treat them with pity and assume they are jealous of you. About the young, say, "Oh, the poor thing had to choose between family and a career. It was so much easier back in the day." And about the old say, "It must be so hard to lose everything piece by piece. I bet they'd turn back time if they could.'

3. Point out the other group's dependence on society while demanding preferential treatment for yourself, "I can't believe he has been on unemployment for so long. I paid into the Social Security system, so I'm not living off him." Or, "The old suck the health care system dry. There is no room left for my maternity

2. Assume you know how they feel.

About the old, say "I bet she's miserable all the time because she's about to die." Or, if she is young, say "I bet she's at that awkward stage and can't find a boyfriend.

And the number one way to promote ageism is to think that it is a one way street. People of all ages experience prejudice. Remember, however, that everyone is an individual. Grouping people together is one way to distance yourself from them, but think how much better our society would be if we could all look beyond the skin, wrinkly or smooth, and visit the person within before you decide about them.

What causes delusional, paranoid, hallucinatory behavior

By Micha Shalev

elusional, paranoid, hallucinatory behavior may be a response to internal or external factors. They most often occur as a result of brain changes in the person with Alzheimer's disease. They may cause the patient great distress or may be little more than mildly stimulating and even comforting. Example: The woman who has an imaginary cat, and enjoys and is comforted by the cat will not be distressed by her delusion.

Caregiving

Problem: Patient believes his food is poisoned and refuses to eat.

Patient misplaces items and accuses others of stealing from him.

Patient can't hear well and is convinced others are talking about him and/or conspiring against him.

Patient sees, hears or feels persons, bugs, or animals that are not there.

Goal: To help the person feel emotionally secure and safe.

To reduce or eliminate behaviors or conditions in the environment that may appear threatening, or lead to confused thinking.

To reduce physical causes of hallucinatory behavior such as fever, dehydration, impaction or poor nutrition.

Suggested approach: Don't argue or try to rationalize. This will only upset the

If the patient is agitated or anxious and believes someone is trying to harm him, try to reassure him or distract him. "I will protect you.'

Try to determine what's causing the behavior. The patient may be misinterpreting a real situation.

Ignore the behavior if it is not causing the patient distress.

If the behavior interferes with caregiving, such as refusing to eat or take medicine because it's "poisoned," report the situation to a nurse or physician.

Be sure the patient can see and hear as well as he can. Does the individual need glasses or a hearing aid? Loss of hearing or vision problems are excess disabilities that may contribute to confused thinking and beliefs because the person cannot interpret correctly what he sees or hears. This is compounded by memory loss caused by Alzheimer's disease. Be sure the area is well-lighted. Reducing noise, stimulation and activity may also help.

Monitor for physical causes: Lack of needed nutrition, insufficient sleep. Dehydration and medications may cause or contribute to confused thinking. Extreme lack of stimulation can lead to disturbance in thinking, too. Some behavior that appears hallucinatory may be an attempt at self-stimulation.

Respond to the feeling tone of the patient's anxiety. Saying "You sound frightened" acknowledges legitimate feelings. Saying, "I will stay with you" further validates and reassures the person in distress.

Currently, the Access Hybrid is accessible for people who may lack full mobility, but who can use their legs to provide power by pedaling, but Janes said it wouldn't be difficult to further adapt the trikes to hand pedals.

He's hoping to make the Access Hybrid widely available and is looking into manufacturing options. He is struggling between offering a more affordable trike, manufactured in China, or an American-made trike, which would cost $800 to $1,000 per bike in manufacturing alone.

Another challenge facing the Access Hybrid is that there are laws restricting the use of motorized vehicles on trails and in parks.

"(They're) not legal, although they aren't the impact that the law was originally designed to address," Janes said. "I'm working with agencies to consider re-visiting their regulations.'

Despite the occasional hiccup, Janes is enthusiastic about the Access Hybrid. The team is also working on prototypes for lighter and more rugged options.

On the verge of a wave of aging baby boomers, Janes sees his invention as a way for active people to keep living life to the fullest, even as their ability to do the things they once loved wanes.

"I've learned about the challenges of mobility, but also the wonderful opportunities with a machine like the Access Hybrid," Janes said. "You get to go out and do the things you wouldn't do otherwise be able to do for the mobility challenged." — AP/Juneau

Money Matters

What to expect from your bond mutual fund

By Stan Choe

NEW YORK —

Oh, right. Stability. That's what bond mutual funds are for.

When stock markets tumbled around the world recently, bond funds remained solid once again. They continued to inch ahead, while stock indexes swung up and down by more than 1 percent for five straight days.

So many investors poured money into bonds in search of safety that the yield on the 10-year Treasury note temporarily dropped below 2 percent for the first time in more than a year. Yields for bonds drop when demand increases and their prices rise.

It's a reminder of the value of bonds in a diversified portfolio. But it's also important for anyone moving into bonds to keep expectations in check following their decades-long run of strong returns. Yields are lower, risks are higher and it may be difficult for bonds to replicate the returns they've produced this year. Here's a look at what to expect:

•Bond funds may make money in the next year, but not much — Many bond funds have returned about 5 percent this year. Managers call that a good year, even though it would rate as a ho-hum return for stocks.

The reason is that bonds don't pay much interest. Many bond funds benchmark themselves against the Barclays U.S. Aggregate index, and it has a yield of 2.15 percent. That's down from 2.50 percent at the start of the year, and it's roughly half of what it was a decade ago.

Bond funds have benefited from a drop in interest rates this year. When that happens, it makes the yields of existing bonds more attractive and pushes up their value. So bond fund investors get returns both from payments made by the bonds and from rising prices for the funds.

Over the next 12 months, interest rates are unlikely to drop much further, said Roger Bayston, senior vice president of Franklin Templeton's fixed-income group. That means returns for bond funds will come mostly from their interest payments. The 10-year Treasury note's yield is below 2.3 percent, but riskier bonds from companies with poor credit ratings can offer yields of about 6 percent.

Bayston is a manager atop the $4.9 billion Franklin Total Return fund, which invests in a wide range of bonds from Treasuries to foreign bonds to high-yield "junk" bonds. Bayston said he's still finding opportunities, including in mortgage-backed securities.

•Bond funds are more stable than stocks, and will likely continue to be ... — An example of that stability is the last September. The average intermediate-term bond fund, which forms the core of most bond portfolios, returned 1 percent. The largest category of stock mutual funds lost 3.7 percent over the same time.

Bonds are promises by companies to repay loans with interest. As long as companies don't default, bondholders will get their promised money. And default rates are low due to how much cash companies are holding, how quickly their earnings are growing and how low their interest payments are.

"If you have a five-year bond, five years from now, you will have cash whether you want it or not," said Jeff Moore, co-manager of Fidelity's $16.1 billion Total Bond fund. "If you own a stock, five years from now, you have the stock."

In the last 30 years, the Barclays U.S. Aggregate index has had a loss just three times. The worst was a drop of 2.9 percent in 1994. Compare that with the Standard & Poor's 500 index, which lost 37 percent in 2008.

Because losses for the bond market are milder than for stocks, it gives investors an opportunity to rebalance their portfolios during down markets, Moore said. "If the stock market is down 50 percent, and bonds are down 10 percent, that's a home run for you" because investors can sell their more resilient bonds to raise cash in hopes of buying low on stocks.

•... But probably not as stable as they have been — "Everything has been a winner the last two to three years," said Gareth Isaac, a manager atop the Schroder Global Strategic Bond fund. Whether high quality or low, bonds have been rising as the Federal Reserve has kept the accelerator floored on stimulus for the economy.

But the central bank, which was purchasing as much as $85 billion monthly, ended its bond-buying program in October. The economy has been improving, and economists expect the Fed to begin raising short-term interest rates late next year.

A rise in rates would mean newly issued bonds offer higher interest payments, but it would also knock down prices for existing bonds. That will mean more volatility in the bond market, with clear winners and losers emerging, Isaac said. It will mean the end for the everything's-rising market.

The question is how high rates will go, and how quickly. If it's a slow, steady rise, managers say the bond market can stay relatively stable. That's what happened from 2004 through 2006, when the Fed raised rates 17 times, and intermediate-

Reverse Mortgage retirement success stories

By Alain Valles

here is great joy helping seniors implement a long term home ownership and retirement plan. It is gratifying to see a senior achieve the goal of remaining independent, having enough cash to enjoy life and having emergency funds available for unexpected challenges. There are many financial products to assist achieving these goals, including pensions, annuities, Social Security, savings and investments. Lately, more and more financial planners are discussing the merits of obtaining a reverse mortgage.

Reverse mortgages are a federally insured loan program that allows qualifying seniors 62 years or older to access the equity in their homes in the form of cash, a monthly check or a line of credit that is available for as long as one lives in the home. Here are just a few examples of how reverse mortgages have been able to help people.

Paying off the mortgage and credit cards: Mortgages and other loan payments can be quite stressful. This is especially true for high interest rate credit cards, some with over 25 percent interest. By paying off consumer debt, auto loans, mortgages and other installment loans with a reverse mortgage, you can significantly reduce financial stress and increase available cash flow.

Rainy day/emergency funds: "Life is what happens to you when you're busy making plans." Even with the best financial advice there will be times when more money is needed. Perhaps there is a health issue, a leaky roof, a car repair, or an adult child that called needing a few dollars and you would rather not liquidate your investments. With proper planning, a reverse mortgage can provide the additional cash needed without impacting your financial

seniors who don't want to move or downsize, but instead make home improvements. Such investments help maintain and often increase the value of a home. Replacing your roof or upgrading to a more efficient heating system are examples of smart investments that can be funded with a reverse mortgage.

Active retirement: "75 is the new 55." With improved living habits and advances in medical care many seniors are enjoying a much more active lifestyle. Travel and entertainment costs money and a reverse mortgage is one option for funds. For others a "working retirement" is the goal. Being able to work when desired while knowing a reverse mortgage can provide any needed cash flow is comforting.

States working to fix hobbled health care websites

By Steve LeBlanc

BOSTON —

The state that served as a template for President Barack Obama's Affordable Care Act had so much trouble coordinating with the federal government that it became a model of another sort: ineptitude.

The Massachusetts website, designed by the same contractor that worked on the troubled federal website, performed so poorly it prompted a public apology from Gov. Deval Patrick and forced health care officials to adopt a series of manual workarounds, creating a backlog of more than 50,000 paper applications.

Some, like Oregon and Nevada, folded and decided to go with the federal exchange for the second round of open enrollment, which began last month. Others, like Maryland and Massachusetts, fired their technology contractors and are hoping for better results this time.

It hasn't been cheap.

The original cost of Massachusetts' website was estimated at $174 million. That has jumped to $254 million. When launched, the website was incompatible with some browsers and was riddled with error messages and navigational problems. The problems were so bad, federal officials gave the state three extra months to meet the requirements of the

Affordable Care Ac

Patrick said the state has "been testing and retesting" the revamped website.

Minnesota's state-run exchange, MNsure, wasn't ready for prime time when it launched in 2013. Some of the technical glitches that frustrated consumers remained unresolved by the time the open enrollment period closed.

MNsure officials promised a better experience this time — with more call center workers and a website that's 75 percent faster. But they also acknowledge the system won't be perfect.

California's exchange also was ill-prepared to handle the high volume of calls, triggering long wait times at help centers and forcing the state to extend open enrollment for two weeks beyond the original March 31 deadline.

"It swamped us," said Covered California Executive Director Peter Lee, promising increased website capacity and extra call center staff.

Maryland's website crashed on the day it opened last year. The state decided there were too many bugs to completely fix Maryland's original system for the new enrollment period, and the board overseeing the exchange fired its prime information technology contractor and transitioned to a new system with technology used by Connecticut.

The problems at Washington state's health care exchange occurred after people signed up for insurance. At least 24,000 people who obtained private insurance couldn't use that coverage when they went to the doctor because of problems crediting payments and sending those dollars on to insurance companies. It took about nine months to fix those problems.

In Vermont, officials announced in August they were scaling back their relationship with the prime contractor on the state's exchange, CGI, reducing the company's role from developing and hosting the Vermont Health Connect site to just hosting it.

Development of the site was switched to another contractor, Optum, the same health care technology firm retained by Massachusetts to revamp its website after it also cut ties with CGI.

Other states fared better.

Colorado's exchange experienced minimal disruptions and the state was able to sign up about 148,000 people.

Kentucky also had a successful rollout, signing up more than 421,000 people for health insurance during the first round of open enrollment.

The states were so successful that when Massachusetts was casting around for solutions to its website troubles, it looked to Kentucky and Colorado for what it called "a proven, off-the-shelf solution."

Connecticut was also able to claim bragging rights: After the launch of its market-place, Access Health CT, officials there predicted the state's uninsured rate would drop to from 7.9 percent to 6.5 percent. Instead it fell to 4 percent.

Patrick said one way to avoid future problems is heightened vigilance.

"Outsourcing and privatizing — this is not the solution," Patrick said. "The solution is to make sure that there's very close oversight even when we use an outside vendor." — AP with a smile and a wink.

Silver, a lifelong Republican, said she generally votes straight GOP. She couldn't recall the last time she voted for a Democrat. "I think I have, but not for a long time," she said.

What really matters, her friends and election officials said, is that the centenarian still takes the time even at her advanced age to get out and vote. Rarely does she opt to vote by absentee ballot; she'd rather come down to the firehouse and choose her candidates in person.

aries, the Contras, who with backing from the U.S. are trying to take back the country.

In Managua, the Nicaraguan capital, Ajax Montoya is grappling with a host of problems, some of them of his own making. A former hero in the Sandinista guerilla movement, Ajax is now a police captain and homicide investigator with a drinking problem and an ex-wife. Trying to stay sober, he's haunted by visions, including a ghostly, eyeless face he sees outside his window at night. All the killing he had to do in the revolution Gannon plagues his dreams as well.

Things become more complicated when Ajax and Gladys investigate a homicide in one of Managua's poorest barrios. What appears at first to be a brutal robbery of a prosperous-looking man shows evidence instead of an execution by the Contras: knife thrusts to the heart and neck. Ajax probes the killing through seedy contacts; all of them are subsequently murdered in the same fashion.

As part of the investigation, Ajax enlists the help of an American journalist in Managua, Matthew Connelly, to make a dangerous journey into the mountains of north Nicaragua to make contact with Contra forces. He also meets Amelia Peck, the aide of a U.S. senator who's on a "fact-finding" mission in the country to determine whether the Senate should approve additional aid to the Contras.

Ajax is increasingly attracted to Amelia, despite an initial comically bad encounter with her. Though that might seem something of a plot device, it gives Gannon a way to examine the political dynamics of the Nicarguan-U.S. relationship, as well as Ajax's own feelings about the Gringos. It turns out he grew up partly in Los Angeles, when his father, a university professor, had been forced to flee Nicaragua during the Somoza regime.

As Ajax says to the U.S. senator, "Politics here is very simple. The world is divided into two hostile camps and the weak must choose."

"Us or the Russians?"

"Yes. Two giants that stride the world, and if we don't choose correctly, they will grind our bones."

But are the Contras — and by extension their U.S. backers — really behind the string of murders? If not, who is? Ajax has to wonder if any of his old Sandinista leaders and comrades still have his back, or if he's become a sacrificial pawn in a political and military chess game.

Gannon, who grew up southwest of Boston, earned his UMass degree in social thought and political economy; he also took journalism courses. After graduating in 1984, he landed a job in New York, editing copy for Inter Press Service, an international news agency. Reading stories sent in from all over the world, he got the yen to do overseas reporting himself, so he headed to Nicaragua in 1987, having learned some Spanish along the way.

He built up contacts and began to sell freelance stories, at first covering economic development, then later human rights issues and the Contras. But Gannon said he never really faced any danger in Nicaragua. It was in El Salvador in 1989, covering the last years of the country's civil war, when he had a scary brush with Salvadoran military and police.

"When you're in a war zone, the worst place to be is where territory changes hands," he said. "That's what happened to me."

He'd spent an evening in a guerrilla encampment, interviewing the soldiers, but discovered in the morning they'd left. A Salvadoran military unit rolled in and took him prisoner; he said he was forced to disrobe at gunpoint by an officer who told him they were looking for an American "terrorist" with distinctive tattoos. Then he was transferred to a branch of the national police — one implicated in widespread human rights abuses, according to various accounts of the war.

Gannon was released later that day, but not before he'd been badly shaken up. "I wasn't as isolated as the guys who were killed by ISIS," he said, noting that U.S. government officials in El Salvador had become aware of his status and called for his release. "But I had really started to panic" before being freed.

Gannon's not done with Nicaragua — at least from a storytelling perspective. He's well into a sequel to Night of the Jaguar in which Ajax — a character he based partly on Omar Cabezas, a Nicaraguan writer and former Sandinista fighter — goes to rescue his partner, Lt. Dario, who's been taken prisoner by the Contras.

And he said he's also getting some key editorial help from his 11-year-old daughter, Valentina, who made some suggestions he incorporated in his first novel. "She's been a big help," he said. — AP/Daily Hampshire Gazette

New nostalgia: home decor with a retro vibe

By Kim Cook

f you spent childhood summers on a northern lake, grew up lunching at diners and shake shacks, or took a college road trip, you'll be all over the next big home décor trend: American

And even if you didn't, you may appreciate the look and feel — an easygoing, aspirational lifestyle centered more on the meandering road than the techno highway.

Brands Lifetime trend expert Tom Mirabile calls the style "visual comfort food.'

The imagery and decor elements draw baby boomers back to what might pictures of old license plates.

feel like simpler, more innocent days. Think vintage-style advertising and artwork, lunch-counter dishware, camping motifs, midcentury surf culture. Old bakeries, drive-ins, roadhouses, garages, beach shacks. It's the kind of retro, outdoorsy charm to be found in the production design of Wes Anderson films like Moonrise Kingdom.

Grace Feyock's wall clock for Uttermost is made of vintage

Online retailer Fab has jumped on the trend, with offerings like Roo Kee Roo's retro-style prints of boating and cottage motifs, made by Forest and Michael Evashevski, > who grew up in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. Beach towels printed with patterns from famed blanket-maker Pendleton have a vintage vibe, and would work in a bathroom as well as at the shore. And a campfire-ready collection of enamelware from Falcon includes a red teapot and serveware. (www.fab.com) Grace Feyock's wall clock for Uttermost is made of vintage pictures of old license plates. A map made of license-plate images makes bold, graphic wall art, by David Bowman. A set of coasters printed with images of the famous Route 66 road sign make a nice addition to the cocktail cart. (www. wavfair.com)

Martin Yeele's photographs of vintage motel and diner signage add style to serving trays from Bob's Your Uncle. (www. bobsvouruncle.com)

At Modcloth, find Karma Living's collection of curtains and pillows in cheerful, '70s-style medallion and floral prints in colorful hues. A blue, purple and pink psychedelic-print tapestry looks hip and new, but boomers will remember similar icons from their college days. Also here, a little chrome table lamp styled like a vintage motorbike's headlight. (www. modcloth.com)

Magical Thinking's wooden letters are embellished with henna-inspired painting at Urban Outfitters, which also carries groovy cotton bedding in paisleys and other retro prints. (www.urbanoutfitters.

Retro-surfer decor is available at several retailers. CB2 has launched a new collection that includes surfboards, canoe paddles, chairs and other accessories. The Hula lamp brings a bit of kitsch to the design forefront. Tiki motif glassware, surfboards and Bodhi vase planters kick up the midcentury Cali vibe. (www.cb2.com)

Or find fun reproductions of surf shop and beach signs at Retroplanet. (www. retroplanet.com)

Moonrise Kingdom fans, consider prints by artist Leah Flores of Portland, Oregon.

"I had a gypsy-esque childhood growing up in various national parks around the United States," she said. "Surrounded by mountains, oceans, wildflowers and redwood forests, I developed a sense of wonder with the natural world early on.

CB2's Hula lamp offers a bit of kitsch

Flores takes photographs of rugged roads, rivers, waves crashing on beaches and misty forests, and then adds an inspired word or phrase, such as "Never Stop Exploring," "Life is a Great Adventure" or "Wanderlust." She sells through Urban Outfitters, Society 6 and her own Etsy shop. (www.etsy.com/shop/leahfloresdesigns)

The trick is to not let this look get too kitschy, unless you want to. A few elements in an otherwise contemporary space pack design punch. But if your style's more boho than Bauhaus, then layering textiles, art and accent items creates a comfortable, lived-in look that captures the charm of retro style. — AP
